Biographical Note

Berenice Abbott (1898-1991) was born in Springfield, Ohio in 1898. In 1918 she moved with friends from Ohio State University, her alma mater, to New York's Greenwich Village, where she was heavily influenced by artists such as Eugene O'Neil and Sadakichi Hartmann. Following other artists to Europe, Abbott moved to Paris in 1921, where she met Man Ray and developed an interest in photography. She honed her craft in Berlin and Paris. Her friendship with photographer Eugene Atget and his death in 1927 prompted her to return to New York City in 1929 in order to promote his photographs for publishing.

Upon visiting the city again, Abbott saw the changing landscape and decided to move back permanently. She approached the Museum of the City of New York's director, Hardinge Scholle, with a proposal to document the changing city. Scholle was impressed with her ideas but funds were not available. Scholle attempted to support Abbott's work by supplying her with names of prominent New Yorkers who she could contact soliciting financial support for her project; unfortunately, this bore no results, either.

In 1935, after photographing New York City independently for six years - unable to get financial support from organizations, foundations, or private individuals - she was hired by the Federal Art Project (FAP) as a project supervisor for what became known as Changing New York, a project to photograph the changing landscape of New York City. The Federal Art Project, a small division of the Works Progress Administration (WPA) formed in 1935 to centralize various public work projects, was a relief agency for artists, designed to show that art contributed to the general welfare. Along with the FAP, the Museum of the City of New York sponsored the project and agreed to purchase a set of Abbott's federally funded photographs. In addition to receiving funds to photograph the city, Abbott received research assistants to help her with the project. From 1935 to 1938, Abbott took even more photographs than the 305 she printed for the definitive set of Changing New York, but only 111 were included when the Museum of the City of New York opened the exhibition in 1937.

Abbott's public acclaim and the FAP's desire for favorable publicity created the opportunity for publication of a Changing New York book. The 1939 New York World's Fair also contributed to the motivation to create a publication as New York publishers anticipated hordes of tourists buying New York City guides. The success of her exhibit in 1937 convinced E.P. Dutton and Co., Inc. to contract with the Federal Writers' Project to publish Changing New York.

For the Dutton book, Abbott was instructed to limit herself to the FAP photographs. Elizabeth McCausland, art critic and Abbott's lifetime partner, was assigned to collaborate with Abbott on the captions for the book. Dutton rejected McCausland's initial design and desired a more conservative lay-out in which 100 full-page photographs would carry traditional captions. The final product leaned more toward a conventional guidebook, presenting photographs in geographical order, progressing from the southern tip of Manhattan to the north, and east to the outer boroughs. Abbott protested the design, but in the end, Dutton had the final say on the captions, selection of photographs, and layout. The book was published in April 1939, and was a huge success, receiving favorable reviews.

The FAP disbanded in 1943 and sent Abbott's 700 negatives to the Museum of the City of New York where they currently reside. Other significant gifts of prints were made to the Museum in the late 1940s. You can view the entire collection of the Museum's Berenice Abbott photography collection online at the Museum's online Collections Portal – <http://collections.mcnyc.org>.

Scope and Content

This collection contains research notes from 1935-1938 which support photographs taken for the Changing New York project, and documentation from 1938-1939 on the editing process of the Changing New York book. Abbott devoted half of her photographs to lower Manhattan, particularly the financial district, the waterfront, the lower East Side, and Greenwich Village. Abbott also photographed areas of Brooklyn and Astoria, Queens. The collection provides insight into one artist's vision to depict the changing nature of New York City during the 1930s.

Arrangement

The collection consists of two series. Series I: Negative research notes for the Changing New York project, is arranged alphabetically based on location, building type (i.e. drug store, fire house, etc.), or official title. We believe this reflects the original arrangement of the material when it was acquired and likely when Abbott or one of her assistants maintained the files. Refer to Appendix A following the container list for a cross reference to folder title by negative number. Series II: Changing New York captions by Elizabeth McCausland and Berenice Abbott, is arranged chronologically and numerically. The first three folders are arranged numerically by page number. The fourth folder is arranged chronologically by date of correspondence from 1936 to 1939.

Series I: Negative research notes for the Changing New York project

Series II: Changing New York captions by Elizabeth McCausland and Berenice Abbott

Series Description

Series I: Negative research notes for Changing New York exhibit, 1935-1938

This series contains research notes of the locations that Berenice Abbott photographed from 1935 to 1938 for the Changing New York project and resulting exhibition. When Abbott deemed a photograph worthy, she gave a proof print to the research staff, who assigned it a number, title, date, and folder. A researcher then assembled information about the subject—filling in a mimeographed worksheet, writing an essay, drawing a map, or collecting newspaper clippings—and placed the material in the folder. Museum of the City of New York curator Grace Mayer had hoped the researchers would provide descriptive captions for the photographs and had planned to highlight their work in a special showcase, but they failed to meet the Museum's deadline and therefore missed the opportunity for public acknowledgement. Some of the folders have titles and negative numbers which correspond to photographs in the Changing New York project, but the folders are empty; please see the "Processing information" and "Container list" for specific information.

Series II: Changing New York captions by Elizabeth McCausland and Berenice Abbott, 1938-1939

This series contains the original, unpublished captions written by Abbott and McCausland as well as drafts of revised captions made by the research team with McCausland's edits. This series also contains weekly reports made by three researchers, Charles White, Sally Sands, and James Broughton; and memos between McCausland and the Project Manager, Lincoln Rothschild. Dutton rejected McCausland's original design of a varied layout of questions, assorted facts, and photographs to create a cinematic effect in preference of a more traditional layout. Abbott protested the book's design, but Dutton's plans were finalized and McCausland began working with the research unit to prepare the captions for the book. Her demands and questions on the new captions stumped researchers Charles White, Sally Sands, and James Broughton, to the point where Lincoln Rothschild, director of the New York office of another FAP project, the Index of American Design, and supervisor of McCausland, reminded her that "the whole purpose of the additional personnel is to make a dead-line and I feel all our efforts should be conditioned by this necessity." [Box 7, folder 4]. Although the original captions were rejected by the publisher, they offer insight into how McCausland and Abbott wanted to describe the photographs and document the changing landscape of the city. There are four folders in this series.

Administrative information

Custodial history

These manuscripts, along with several of Abbot's photographs from the Changing New York project, were in the custody of the Metropolitan Museum of Art prior to their transfer to the Museum of the City of New York. According to a note in the 1947 gift paperwork, Activity 08574, from Mr. Benjamin Knotts in the Metropolitan's Office of Vice-Director, "These Berenice Abbott photographs were left with the Metropolitan Museum of Art at the time the Index of American Design drawings and files were left with us." The American Index of Design was another project of the FAP, and this material seemed to have been deposited with the Metropolitan if not quite by accident, perhaps as a matter of convenience.

Acquisition information

Custody of the collection was transferred to the Museum in 1947 from the Metropolitan Museum of Art along with 215 unmounted and 71 mounted photographs from the Changing New York project. Due to the Museum of the City of New York's role as a sponsor for the original project, the Metropolitan Museum felt their rightful home was with MCNY. These items were brought into the collection on Activity #08574 along with photographs. The photographic material was officially accessioned in 1990, on Activity 25263, accession numbers: 89.2.1, 89.2.2 and 89.2.3, but the manuscript material was not.

Processing information

This collection has been in the custody of the Museum since acquiring it from the Metropolitan Museum in 1947. When Lindsay Turley assumed the role of Manuscripts Archivist in 2010, the collection had been re-housed and research copies had been made of all material, but no finding aid existed. As mentioned in the Series I description, some folders, though titled with photograph names and negative numbers, are empty. Most likely, these folders contained only the proof prints, and never included any corresponding research, but these prints were removed, formally accessioned, and housed with the photo collection in 1990 (accession number range 89.2.3.1-354). It is assumed that this reflects the original order of the material when acquired from the Metropolitan Museum; and therefore, the empty folders have been retained in the arrangement. Intern Suzanna Calev fully processed and described the collection in May and June 2013, under the supervision of Manuscripts Archivist Lindsay Turley.
